On November 18, he returned to Emnillen Police Station for further questioning but he refused to give another statement and made several comments about being extremely drunk on the night of the incident.

The court heard that the owner of the takeaway claimed the cost of repair to the chair would cost some £150, however, defence solicitor Michael Fahy queried this cost, stating that it was a basic chair that "one would find in a basic takeaway".

Mr Fahy added: "He has progressed positively in his behaviour stated that the defendant would be spared a prison sentence because of the report given by the probation service.

He continued: "There is every reason why I should sentence you to prison because you breached a suspended sentence. It is not entirely different from the offence you committed previously.

"I will not sentence you to prison today only because of the contents of the probation report." Armstrong was ordered to complete 200 hours of community service and pay a restitution of £150.
